Home Bank Needs Judicial Investigation

Under existing circumstances the affairs of the Home Bank of Canada should be investigated, possibly by a Royal Commission. The latter is suggested as the experience in the case of the Merchants Bank of Canada that under the usual court procedure
the investigators are bound and handcuffed by the narrow limits of the judicial findings that tend to transparent proceedings on all sides.

"Something is rotten in Denmark,"
"inspect the Home Bank in self-evidence. The financial statement of this institution to the Dominion Government for the month of June last, shows a deficit of $100,000.
A solvent condition with a reserve fund of $100,000, which was declared as June 30th last, the general manager's statement to the shareholders to the effect that the Home Bank had fully maintained its position and that full provision had been made for all bad and doubtful debts.
Worse yet, in view of what has happened, a quarterly dividend was declared in June.

Possibly the most damning feature of the entire episode was the announcement of a large stock of President H. J. Daly at a time when it must have been apparent to those conversant with its business that the bank was in a bad way.
Three months before the Home Bank declared its dividend, President
Daly completed, through the late Merchants Bank, a general transfer of all the assets of the Home Bank to a deal with a brokerage house for the purpose of obtaining a loan from the Home Bank stock. The agreement for the sale of this stock was made in January last and by its terms the stock was to be sold to Mr. Daly $80 per share. The stock was sold over the months as layers could be found and the brokerage house had paid to Mr. Daly the sum of $90,000.

TO THE GOAL
Many there are who walk the pleasant pathway
Many there are who walk the pleasant pathway
Or, if at times they cross a darkening valley,
Soon that is passed, the light is shining still.
Never the sun too hot for their enduring way.
Never the night too dark to know the way.
Always some birds make music, with their singing.
Always some flowers along the roadside stir.
If they be called, to breast a rushing Sucker comes soon, to guide them to the shore.
Gentle their souls, and peace is in their presence.
If they be called, to sail, till journeying is o'er.

Onward they march, then pass from mortal view.
Honored by many, pined by the few.
Others there are whose story path leads onward.
Mid fog of doubt, through bramble Strife and pain, they strive to find the hidden quail.
If they be called, to sail, till journeying is o'er.
Sometimes, perchance, alone, when weary of the world,
Wistful, they pause, to catch the light of dawn
Or, if they be called, to sail, till journeying is o'er.
To reach a lily from the airy blackness.
Then, when at last they climb the steepest mountain.
Where God's own glory hides the clouds of gloom,
They find the peace the multitude is longing for.
They find the peace the multitude is longing for.

Onward they march, then pass from mortal view.
Honored by many, pined by the few.

THE TRUE STORY OF ARCHDUEL RUDOLPH'S END

Undoubtedly the greatest romance of modern times is that concerning the death of thirty-four years ago, the Austrian Archduke, Rudolph and the beautiful Marie Valerie. Hundreds of newspapers have been written on the subject and books and plays have been inspired by the tragedy. There never was an official statement issued by the Austro-Hungarian Empire as to the cause of the Archduke's death. In consequence there have been innumerable stories set forth. That both met death there was no doubt. But the cause never disputed, but had the Archduke been shot by a common criminal? Did he first slay his sweetest and then destroy himself? One widely accepted theory was that the Archduke had been murdered by Count Waldstein, who loved the girl. The girl, in despair, had taken her life. Then there was a story which revealed a drunken revel at the lodge, in the course of which the Archduke had been slain with a champagne bottle. The Italian Ambassador at Vienna, one of the few who saw the Archduke's body, said that there was wound in the head such as might have been made by a heavy bottle.
